Our Story

We haven’t told the EdTech story right... until now.

The impact that technology (aka digital) has had on education has been revolutionary... but not for all students. While some students have the tools and access to learn from the floorboards up, others find themselves struggling in the digital environment. It’s Edtech versus the real world: students are being taught to collaborate, innovate, and develop critical thinking skills, other students languish in data rooms that look remarkably similar to those from decades ago.

Who is Edtech? Is this just a new set of policies, or budgets, or local control, or even Common Core. But the truth is this: we’ve done this to ourselves, we haven’t told the EdTech story right.

As an industry, we have to find a new direction, a new course, to telling our story. As learning becomes a lifelong endeavor, crafting a narrative that supports education technology is even more vital.

The marriage of technology to education has created companies new ways to teach and learn. Today’s EdTech requires completely new ways to tell these stories.

So that’s what we do here - we champion EdTech, and help EdTech companies tell their stories.
Question 1: What’s Your Website For?

You might be surprised to know how many new clients come true for an improved website because they “know they need one” even if they can’t tell you why. What these business owners and executives are expressing is that they understand how important a website can be, but aren’t really sure what their web presence should actually accomplish.

Website can serve a lot of different functions, of course. It can be a tool for sales and marketing; a hub for public relations; and even a workhorse for recruiting. A good web design company is going to help you ensure that your website is all of these things, and serve others. However, none of these things matter unless you have a clear understanding of what you really want your website to do. You need to know what it’s going to be used for before it can be designed, coded, and launched.

Even if this seems simple, it’s a good idea to explicitly state the outcomes you’re looking for in your new website. Don’t settle for generalities. If your initial instinct is to say your purpose of your new website is “to bring in sales,” then refine that further. Perhaps you want to generate qualified leads for your sales team at a cost of five per week. Or, to improve revenue by showing to online purchasers or reservations.

Question 2: What Will Your Website Do?

When you have tackled the question of what purpose of your website will be, you have to decide what it should actually do. These ideas are already related, of course, but they aren’t the same thing. To illustrate why, let’s look at well-known web-based company: Amazon.

The purpose of Amazon’s websites is clearly to sell books and other products. However, the website does quite a lot more. It processes orders, makes customized recommendations to customers, maintains an inventory database, and hosts several million reviews. It even features customer service links like generating shipping labels and processing returns.

Imagine for a moment that Amazon founder, Jeff Bezos and his management team had settled for a website that was basically an online brochure for his book selling company. Where would Amazon be today? Or more accurately, where wouldn’t it be?

Search Engine Optimization (SEO)

Search Engine Optimization is an Internet Marketing activity that brings more traffic to your website. SEO is an art and a science which gets your website to appear high up on the screen when someone searches for your product or service. Search engine traffic is so valuable it can bring in enough clients to sustain most businesses even without any other marketing. If you aren’t prominent in search results, as far as your customers are concerned, you don’t exist. If you website shows up at the top of search results then customers will go to your website. If your site is not highly visible in search results then the customer will go to your competition.

There are many benefits to search engine optimization:

- Increased sales. Search engines bring pre-qualified customers to your website.
- Lower customer acquisition costs. There is no cost-per-click in organic search traffic so each search has a larger profit margin.
- Credibility. Customers and suppliers take you more seriously when you are highly ranked.
- Competitive advantage. When customers are driven to your website, they’re not going to your competition.

Search Enging Optimization can be combines with pay per click advertising. Contact us to learn more about how GoingClear can help you with a combined portfolio of Pay-Per-Click and SEO services.

Internet Marketing
Social Media Development & Integration

Social Media is a term gaining popularity at lightening speed. If you knew someone in Marketing, you probably have heard them mentioning the cool stories they read on Twitter, or the hot video making the rounds on Youtube, the connections made on LinkedIn or some other great benefit of some platform online. People often want to get the same benefits for their companies, but once they set on their social quest, they find it’s not as easy as joining one of the platforms and distributing their Marketing materials.

Social Media is about interactions, conversations and giving. Inbound Marketing is the newest disruptive business “tool”. It’s not so much of a tool as it is a practice. Creating long term relationships with your clients through conversations, giving them information to make their lives easier and correcting customer service mishaps are the new best practices in social marketing.

It takes time, effort and skill to implement social strategies and doing it on your own can be confusing or even frustrating. Instead of struggling through it on your own, connect with someone who understands the value of listening to your customers. Find your customers and join their conversation, don’t make them try to find you.
